MR. CHIEF JUSTICE BURGER, dissenting:

In a case such as this, confusion often arises as to what is the Court's proper role in reaching a decision. Our task is not to give effect to our individual views on capital punishment; rather, we have taken oaths to determine what the Constitution permits a State to do under its reserved powers. In striking down the death penalty imposed upon the petitioner in this case, the Court has overstepped the bounds of proper constitutional adjudication by substituting its policy judgment for that of the State legislature. I accept that the Eighth Amendment's concept of disproportionality bars the death penalty for minor crimes. But rape is not a minor crime; hence the Cruel and Unusual Punishments Clause does not give the Members of this Court license to engraft their conceptions of proper public policy concerning the death penalty onto the considered legislative judgments of the States. Since I cannot agree that Georgia lacked the constitutional power to impose the penalty of death for rape, I dissent from the Court's judgment.

Dear Byron:

Will you please add the following at the foot of your opinion in the above:

"Mr. Justice Brennan, concurring in the judgment:

Adhering to my view that the death penalty is in all circumstances cruel and unusual punishment prohibited by the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments, Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153, 227 (1976), I concur in the judgment of the Court setting aside the death sentence imposed under the Georgia rape statute."

[May —, 1977]

MR. JUSTICE POWELL, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I concur in the judgment of the Court on the facts of this case, and also in its reasoning supporting the view that ordinarily the death penalty is disproportionate for the crime of raping an adult woman. Although rape is invariably a serious crime, there is no indication that petitioner's offense was committed with excessive brutality or that the victim sustained serious or lasting injury. The Court does not, however, limit its holding to the case before us or to similar cases. Rather, in an opinion that ranges well beyond what is necessary, the Court holds that capital punishment always—regardless of the circumstances—is a disproportionate penalty for the crime of rape.

The Georgia statute, sustained in Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U. S. 153 (1976), specifies aggravating circumstances that may be considered by the jury when appropriate. With respect to the crime of rape, only three such circumstances are specified: (i) the offense was committed by a person with a prior record of conviction for a capital felony; (ii) the offense was committed while the offender was engaged in another capital felony or in aggravated battery; and (iii) the offense was "outrageously or wantonly vile, horrible or inhuman in that it involved torture, depravity of mind, or an aggravated battery to the victim." Ante, at 3. The dissent of the Chief Justice, relying on selected excerpts from my opinion in Furman, seeks to buttress the view that for sentencing purposes a meaningful distinction cannot be drawn between rapes regardless of the circumstances and effect upon the victim. Post, at 4, n. 2. The dissent emphasizes the difficulties of proof. But the jury system is designed and operates successfully to resolve precisely this type of factual issue. The law of negligence, for example, is replete with issues requiring the jury to determine degrees of culpability and the extent or permanency of physical and psychological injury.

I am complimented by the frequency with which the Chief Justice, in his dissent, cites and quotes from my opinion in Furman. That opinion, however, did not prevail, and - as with most of the writing in Furman - it now must be read in light of Gregg and Woodson, which have established the controlling general principles. But contrary to implications in the Chief Justice's dissent, my opinion in Furman did emphasize that the proportionality test as to rape should be applied on a case-by-case basis, noting that in some cases the death sentence would be "grossly excessive." Furman, supra, at 461. I remain in disagreement with the simplistic all-or-nothing views of the plurality opinion and the dissenting opinion of the Chief Justice.
